Dear Katy
I always read you in the comics. I love you very much and I think you are very pretty. I don't always get to read your comics because I am in a T. B. A KATY KEENE STORY

DON'T WASTE THE MOON- LIGHT!

They rode along at an easy canter. You'd think from their laughter that they were a happy trio, these two boys and the gorgeous girl. But as the trail led them into a grassy meadow, K. O. Kelly was thinking: "This rich punk Randy has some scheme to ditch me, so I can't go to the moonlight dance with Katy tonight!"

Reining his creamy gold palomino to a halt, Randy Van Ronson jumped down and gazed slyly at the train rails curving across the flatlands and gleaming in the late afternoon sun.

"The four P. M. express will be along in a few minutes," Randy thought. "Then what a surprise the horse Jigger will give this muscle-earred ape boy K. O. Kelly. I'll have Katy to myself tonight."

Katy Keene sprang from her glistening palomino. She was as lithe and graceful as a fawn and such a vision of loveliness in her gray riding ensemble.

"Oh, what a beautiful day!" Katy cried. "And tonight—a full moon!"

K. O. dismounted from the spirited steeldust horse Jigger, who was a retired movie star. Plopping disconsolately in the grass, K. O. plucked idly at the shiny leaves of a plant.

"Hey!" Randy exclaimed. "That's poison ivy!"

"Doesn't bother me," K. O. said grumpily. "I never catch it."

"You wouldn't, nature boy," Randy thought irritably. "But I catch it if I even look at poison ivy."

From far behind them came the whooo-whooo of the four o'clock express. Jigger raised his head and neighed softly, his ears twitching.

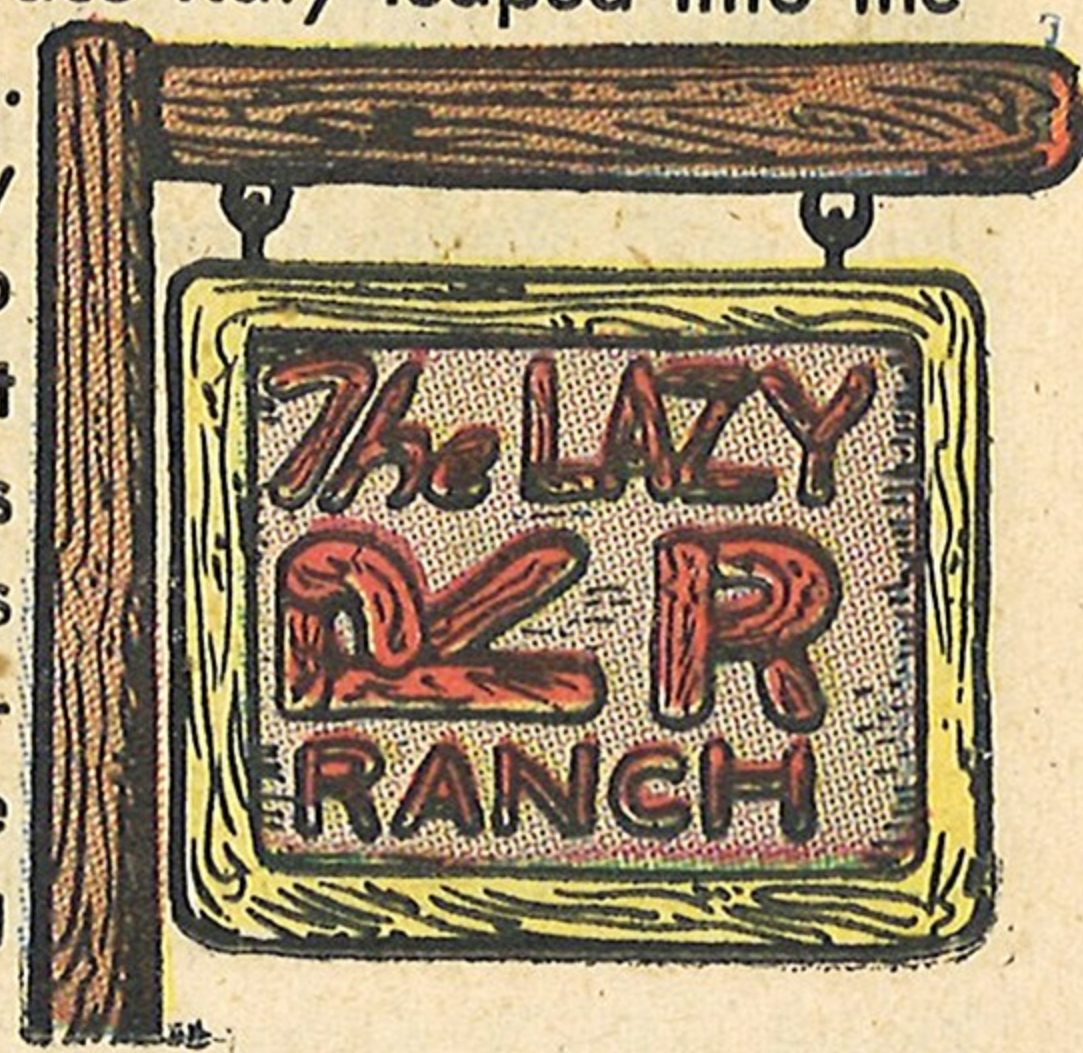

Randy smiled thinly. Jigger would take care of K. O. Money wasn't everything. You had to use your brains, too. By inviting K. O. up to his Lake Arrowhead lodge, Randy was showing Katy that he was a generous, fair-minded guy. Already it had gained Katy's sympathy and appreciation. No one could accuse Randy of trying to corral Katy with dollar signs. Except K. O.

"Randy invites me to his summer lodge," K. O. was thinking bitterly, "to show me up in front of Katy. He has all the money in the world, and all I've got is myself."

The express, still in the distance, was coming on fast. You could hear the clackety-clack of the wheels on the rails. Jigger was stomping his hoofs and snorting.

"Isn't Jigger terrific!" Katy said. "No wonder he was a movie star! You take my palomino, K. O. I'm going to ride Jigger!"

With effortless grace Katy leaped into the steeldust's saddle. Randy uttered a cry of alarm. He tried to grab the reins, but a touch of Katy's heels to Jigger's flanks sent the splendid steeldust horse into a plunging gallop.

The four o'clock express thundered around a bend. Jigger let out a shrill whinny and was a streak of dust heading for the railroad tracks.

"No, Katy, no!"

Randy cried in panic. "You mustn't ride Jigger! Come back! Come back!"

K. O. sprang to his feet, the old Kelly temper showing. "Why mustn't Katy ride Jigger? What's the gimmick? What trick are you trying to pull now?"

Randy was in the saddle of his palomino without touching the stirrup. The golden horse went like the wind after Katy. Astride Katy's palomino and shaking with fury, K. O. was right behind Randy and gaining. He could outstride the rich boy.

Jigger swung parallel with the tracks and raced alongside the speeding train. In the movies Jigger had done it hundreds of times. He was so used to racing trains in cowboy pictures that in retirement, he continued to race them.

K. O. shot ahead of Randy. "Rein him in, Katy!" K. O. shouted. "Rein him in!"

Randy grinned. Let K. O. ride ahead of him. You couldn't stop Jigger with the reins. Jigger was a movie horse, an actor who took orders from the director. Whenever a director yelled "Cut!"—the movie term for "scene over, stop the cameras," Jigger would stop, and not before.

Let K. O. try to rescue Katy. When he failed, Randy would shout the magic word, and tonight under the moonlight he'd be the big throb in Katy's heart.

But you can't make a blueprint of your life, can you? Randy's palomino stepped into a woodchuck hole. The beautiful creature stumbled. Randy catapulted over the creamy mane, and landed ker-plunk in a dainty patch of poison ivy.

Katy was heading for the bank of a dry river. She was sitting the saddle like a goddess, but she couldn't halt Jigger's wild headlong plunge. If they hit the river bank—K. O.'s heart leaped into his throat.

"To the right, Katy!" he yelled. "Cut to the right! Katy! Katy!"

The train was rumbling over the trestle. Two-three more plunges, and the girl and the wonderful horse would go flying into the boulder-strewn river bed. K. O. wanted to die.

"Katy!" he screamed frantically. "Cut to the right! Cut! Cut!"

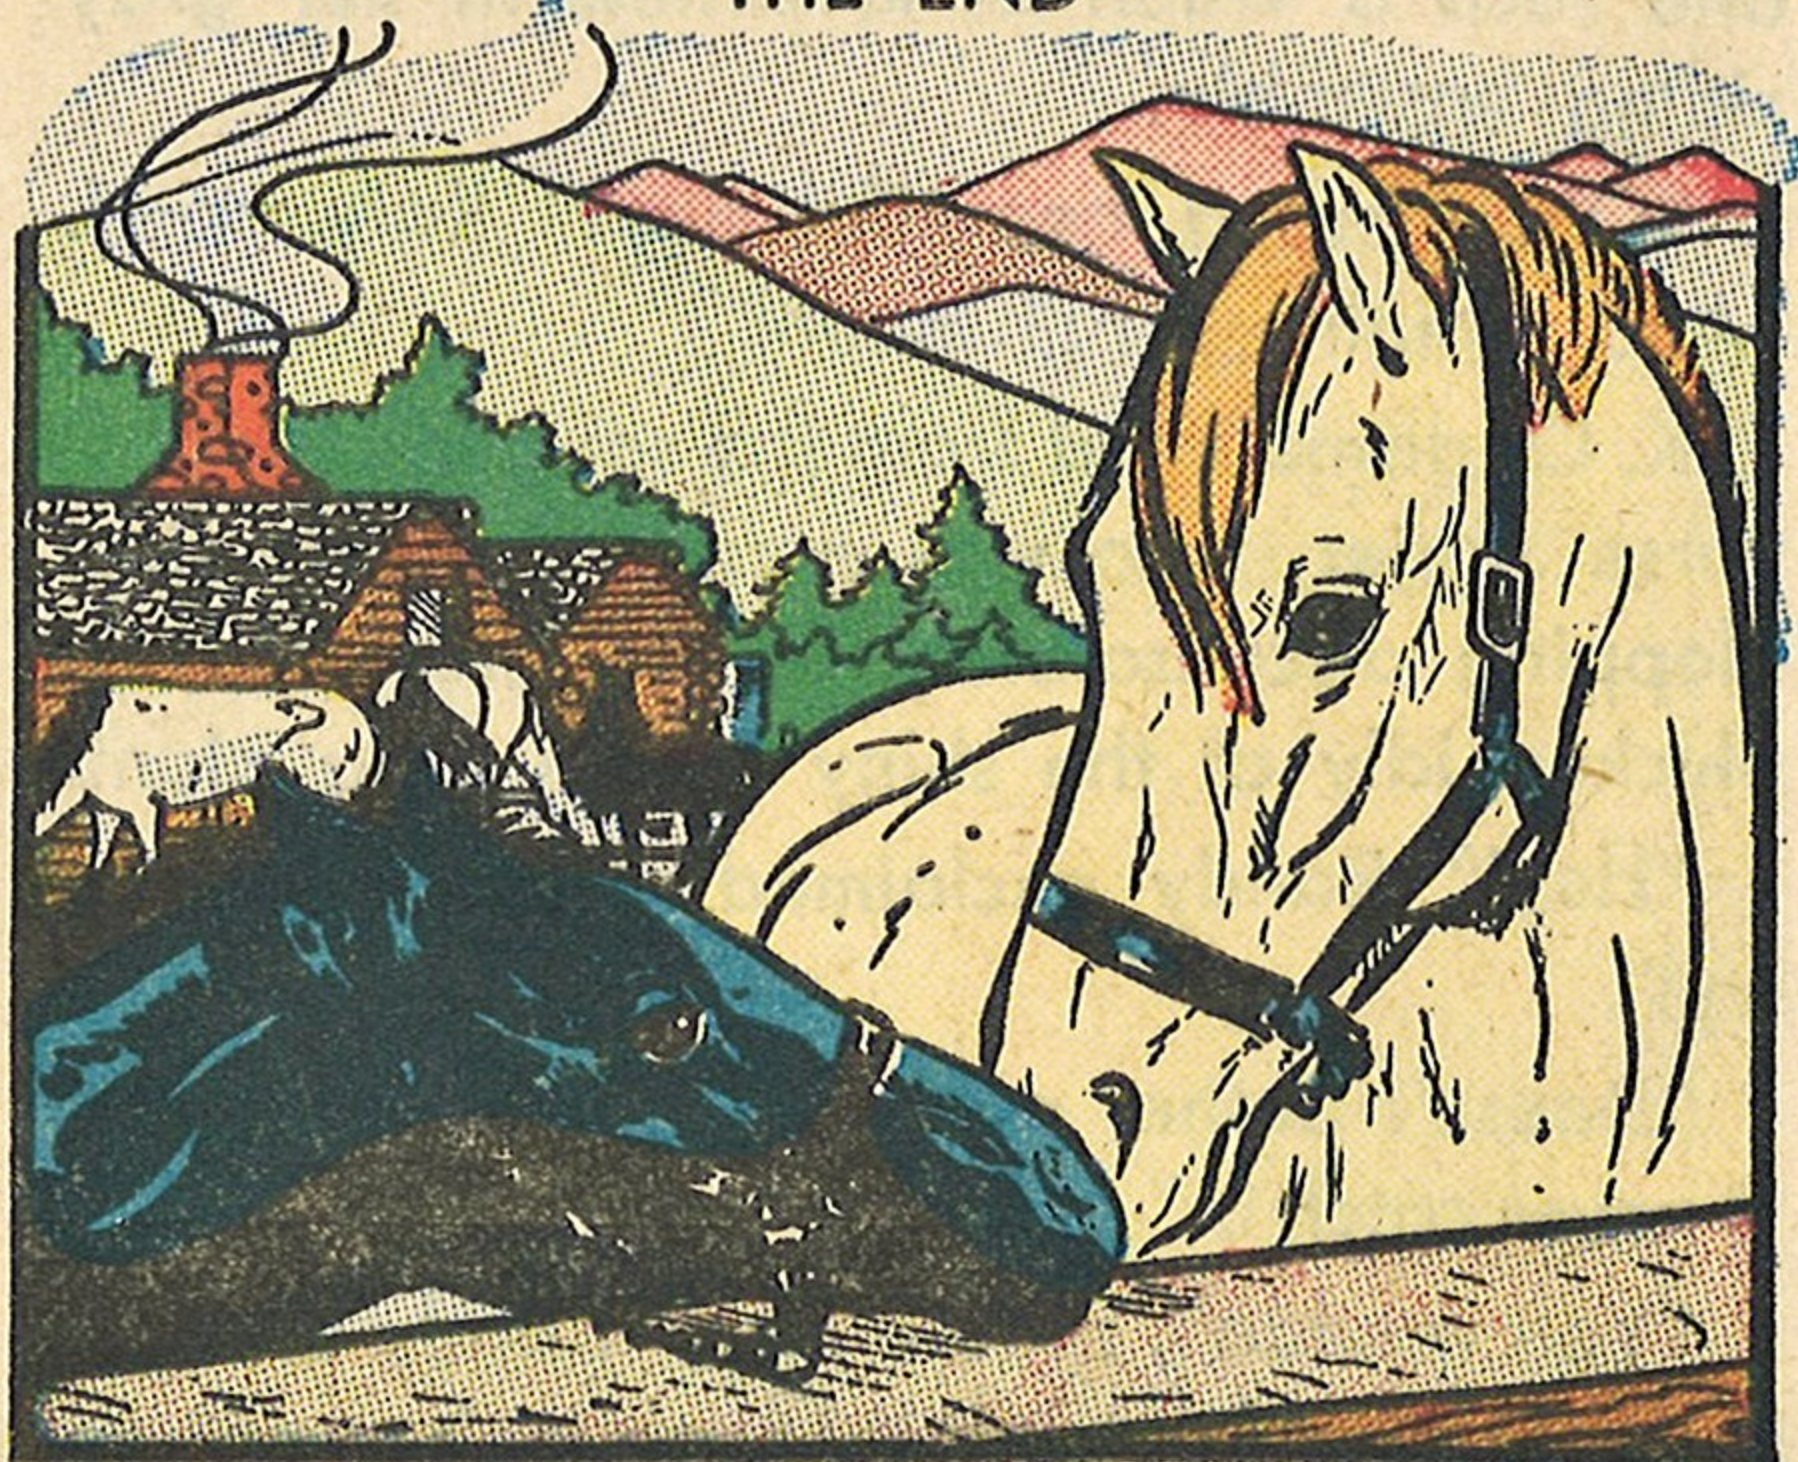

That did it! Jigger went back on his haunches and came to a sliding halt which would have thrown a lesser rider than Katy twenty feet through the air.

Hours later, with the full moon filtering a silver glow through the pines and the spruce, you would have seen a sheepish look on Randy's face—if you could have seen his face. It was swathed in lotion-soaked bandages. Randy had a beautiful case of poison ivy.

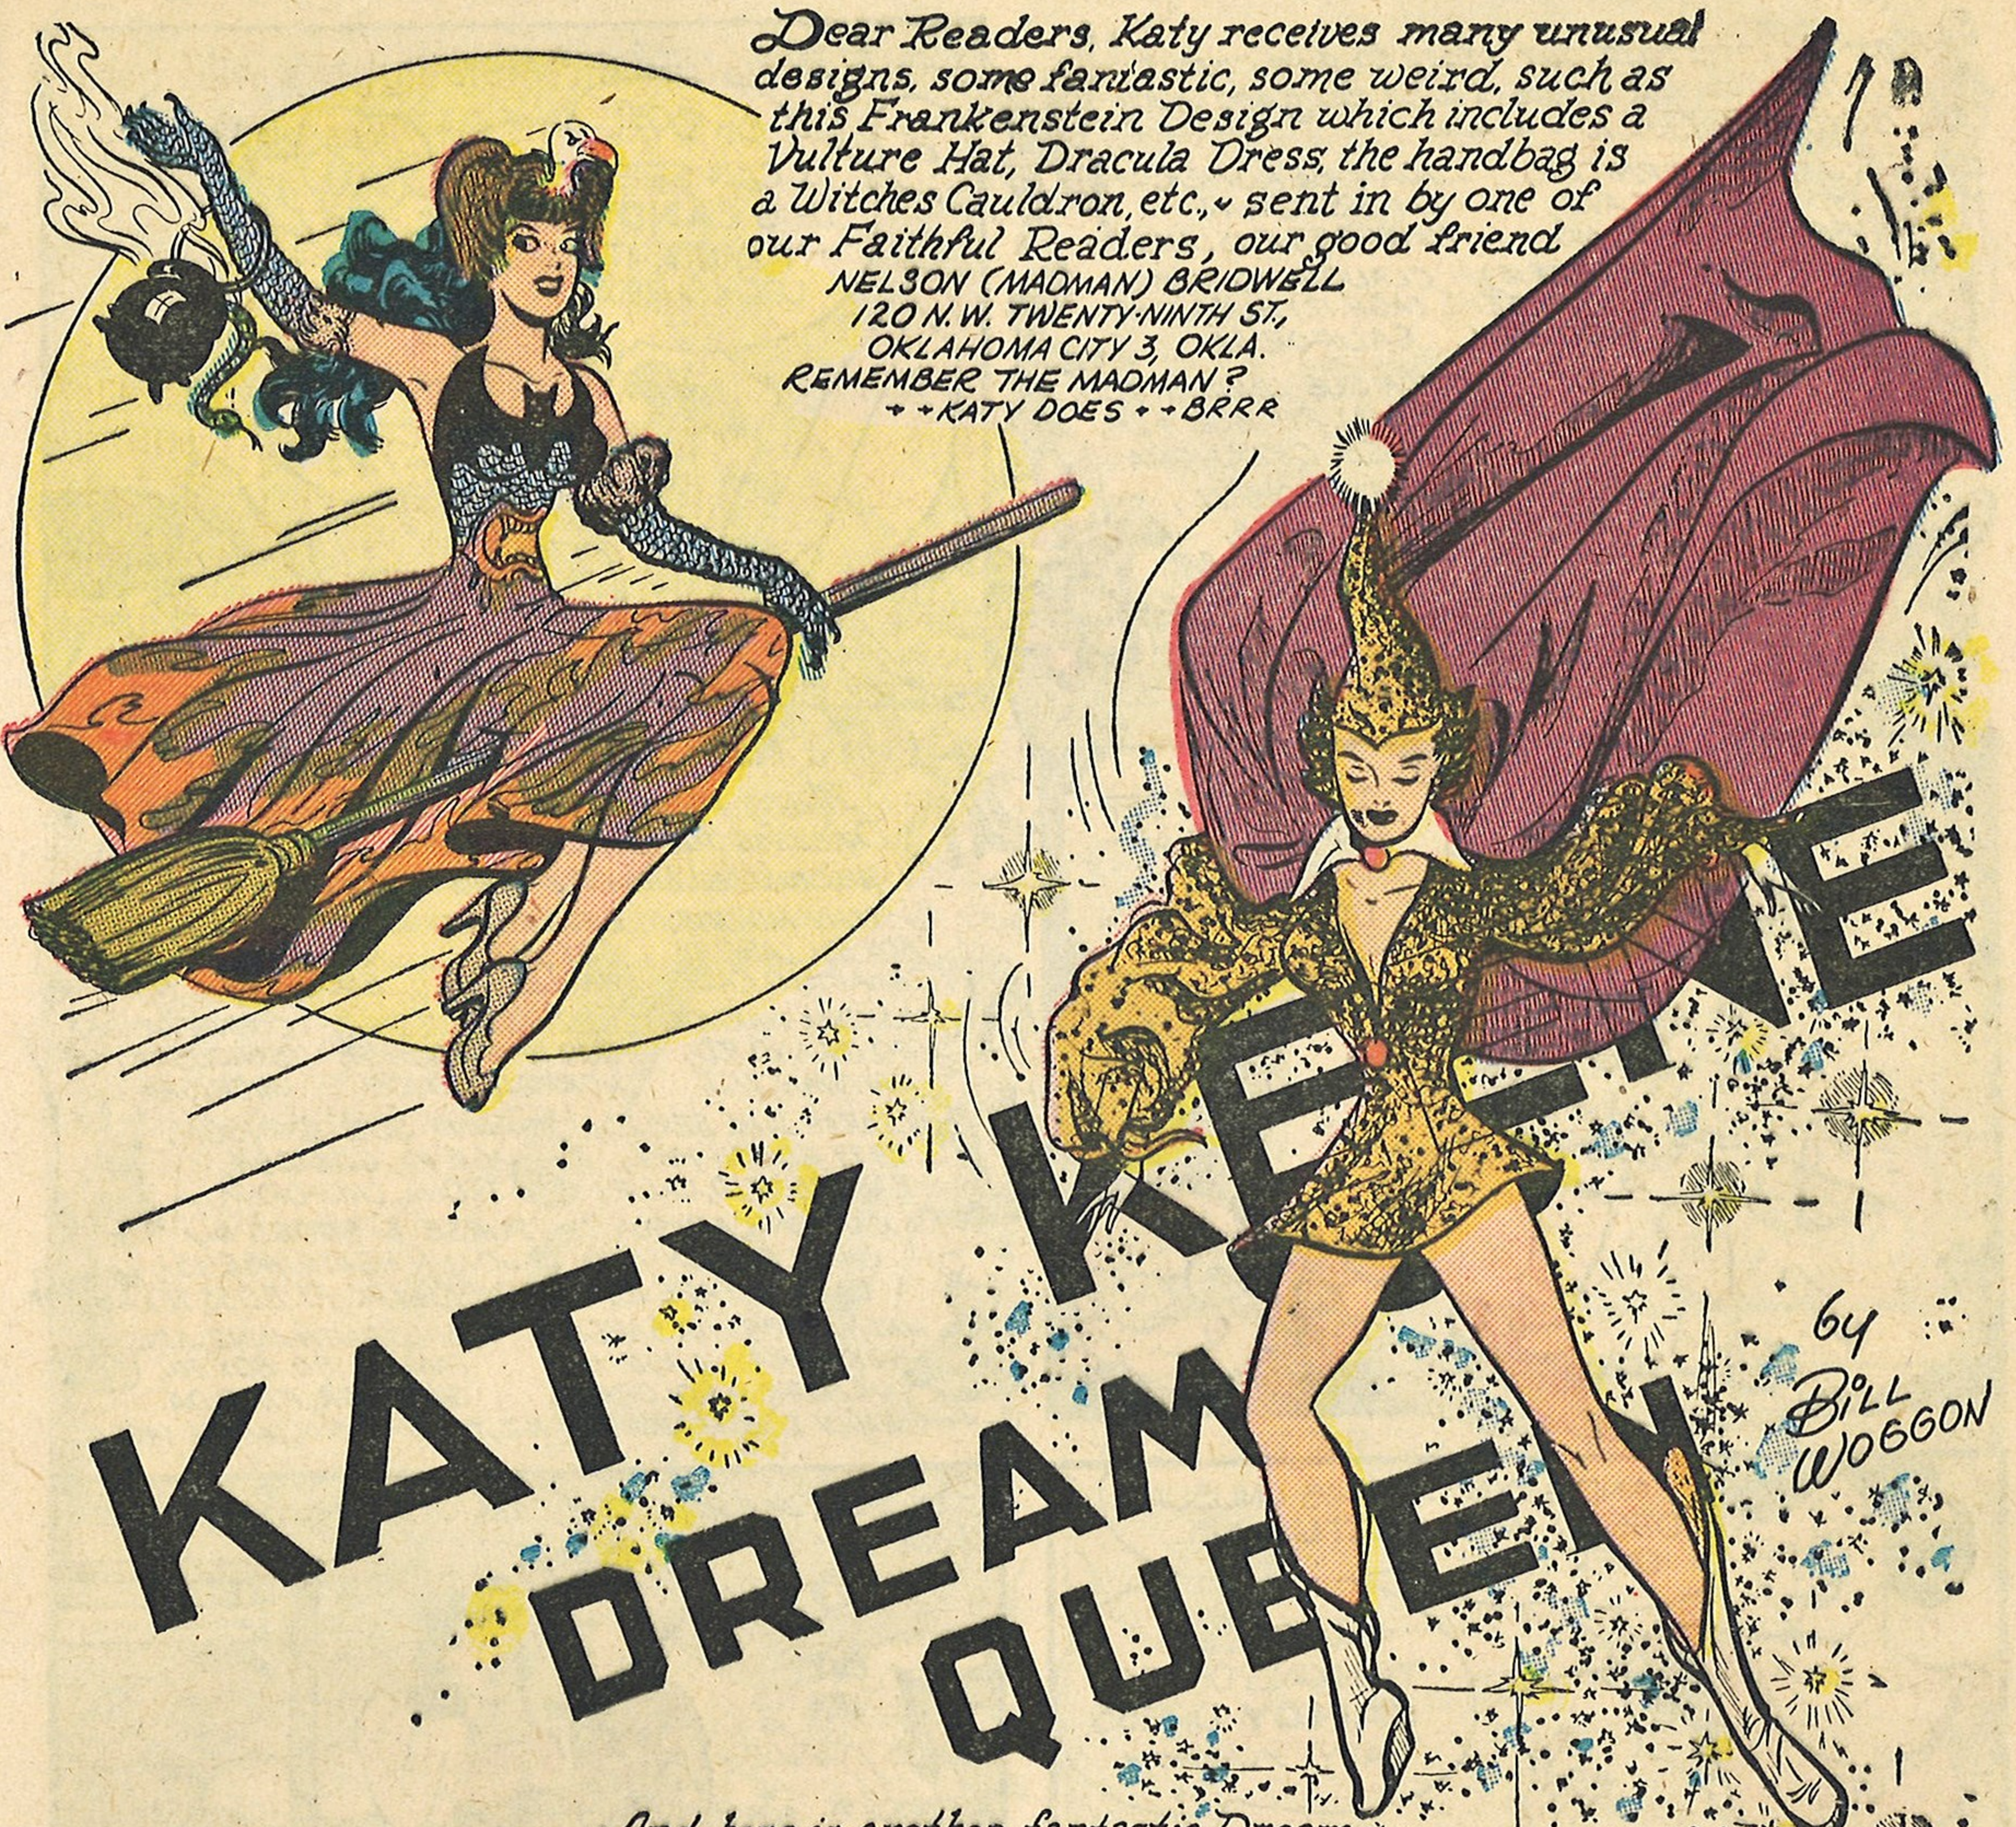

K. O. and Katy were on the top step of the veranda, ready to take off for the dance. K. O.'s shoulders in his tropical tux would have made a tailor swoon with delight. Ravishing in filmy tulle, Katy was a dream walking.

"What are you waiting for?" Randy growled through his bandages, envy tinging the gratitude he felt for Katy's rescue. "Are you trying to make me feel worse than I do? Beat it! Get out of my sight! And don't waste the moonlight!"
